In a classic case of "life imitating dystopian sci-fi pulp fiction," the German Fourth Reich has announced big plans for so-called "far-right extremist" (which now means "anyone not blindly obedient to government") elements of the population it oversees.

This will evoke in many connoisseurs of pop culture remembrance of a little ditty from 2002 titled "Minority Report," the plot of which is that the state has devised a convoluted method of detecting crime before it happens and therefore eliminated all murders in Washington, D.C. by 2054.

Via Associated Press:

> "Germany's top security official said Tuesday that she aims to make it easier to trace right-wing extremists' financing and plans to set up an 'early recognition unit' to detect far-right and foreign disinformation campaigns as early as possible.
>
> Interior Minister Nancy Faeser's proposals follow large protests against the far right in Germany in recent weeks. They reflect growing concern after a report said extremists met to discuss deporting millions of immigrants, including some with German citizenship, and that some members of the far-right Alternative for Germany party, whose support has doubled since the country's 2021 election, were present.
>
> Germany's domestic intelligence agency says the number of far-right extremists has been rising. In 2022, it reached 38,800, with 14,000 of them considered potentially violent. The agency's head, Thomas Haldenwang, said the numbers are believed to have risen again last year."*
